RADIO FOR EVERYBODY

By E. F. DE BRA

What is a "condenser," and why is it used in a radio set? Roughly speaking, any pair of electrical conductors such as metal plates, separated by a non-conductor such as air, rubber or glass, form a condenser. Its value depends upon the fact that it has "capacity," or the ability to store electricity.

An interesting thing happens if we take such a condenser and connect one of the plates to the positive side of a battery. There is a sudden flow of electricity into the plate, which stops almost instantly as the plate becomes "charged" or reaches the same positive "electrical pressure" as the battery.

By a strange process, as our first plate becomes charged positively, an equal and opposite charge of negative electricity is "induced" upon the other plate. When these two charges become equal to the potential furnished by the battery, no more current will flow. In other words, a condenser placed in a direct current circuit will act as a dam and prevent any current flowing.

But what happens if the condenser be placed in an alternating current, which is the condition we have when we use one in our radio set? Here the charge on the first plate will rise from zero to maximum positive potential just as in our former experiment, but then it will decrease to zero, and as the current reverses in direction it will rise to maximum negative potential, then back to zero. This is called one "cycle."

The second plate, as we have said, is in the meantime having induced upon it a corresponding opposite charge. Its cycle going from zero to negative maximum, and back to zero, this induced charge may be led off the second plate by a connecting wire similar to the one bringing the charging current to the first plate. By a strange process, as our first plate becomes charged positively, an equal and opposite charge of negative electricity is "induced" upon the other plate. When these two charges become equal to the though the plates be separated by several inches of air, or by several layers of a perfect non-conductor. The "capacity" of a condenser depends upon the size of the plates, upon the distance separating them, and upon the nature of the "dielectric," or the substance between them. In electrical study it is designated by the letter "C," and is measured in micro-farads. Sometimes we want to use the condenser simply as a reservoir to store electricity, as in our first example with a direct current charging battery; sometimes we want to use it in a circuit where alternating current must be allowed to pass, but any direct current must be stopped. It is a most useful instrument and is indispensable to our radio set.

We have now some conception of the meaning of "inductance" and "capacity," the two most important factors in radio engineering. We will see next time how they serve in combination to make possible this modern miracle of Radio.
